Introduction

There is a large quantity of useful material which is not easily accessible to be found in science periodicals as special features, or special issues. It is important to make people aware of these annual or occasional and unique compilations of information. This listing of special features is meant as a framework from which to start. The usefulness of this publication lies primarily in indexing features that appear in periodicals on a regular basis, although some features coming out occasionally or on a one-time basis are included because of their importance.

Almost 100 new entries have been added since the first compilation in 1983. There was a suggestion to add a list of the periodicals indexed and this has been incorporated. The issues continue to change, therefore inconsistencies remain in some references.

Uniformity was attempted in all the entries, but due to the eccentricities of periodicals, there is variance. The titles used for the special issues were obtained from the cover, spine, or table of contents. If there was no title, a title was supplied and bracketed. References to the issues were given by month wherever possible; in some cases, however numbers or "seasons" were used. When the month is preceded by "a" or "an" it indicates that this is a weekly and the issue date varies from year to year. A complete date including year indicates this is an irregular or one-time feature. The call number designations are all locations in the Science Department of the University Library. In most cases the issues will be found shelved with the current periodicals; if bound, the periodicals will be intershelved by call number with the books. The call numbers having "Ref" at the end will be found in the Reference Area of the Science Department.
